

Salmon know no borders

“In the lower Yukon it’s hard to understand the problems of those upriver.

But people should work together and understand that we’re all working toward the same goals – getting more kings upriver to spawn.

People are starting to understand. They are switching to chum when they can fish.”

“Fifty percent of the fish come from Canada, and if you take those fish, you’ll be wiping out half the fish in the run.

You won’t ever be able to fish on those fish again.

That’s an important side of things – to manage for the whole river, across borders.”

“If we want to rebuild a healthy run of kings again, we have to work together to take care of them until they rebound.

Nobody wants to be responsible for the demise of this great species, that has provided so well, for so long, to the people of the Yukon River.”

“I really like the way the fishers are working together in Canada and in the U.S. We have to do what we can.

We have to work together and be part of the solution.

Regardless of how things turn out, we’ve got to do our part, do the right thing.”

In tough times we need to stick together. It’s not for us, it’s for everybody in the future.

I want my kids and their kids to be able to depend on the kings and enjoy them. That’s worth my sacrifice today.”
